The children's journey began when they were flying with their mom from the village of Araracuara, to San Jose del Guaviare. On May 1 in 2023, their small plane had engine trouble, and crashed in the rainforest. (1a), all three adults on the plane died, including the children's mother. This left the four children alone in the jungle. The oldest child was a 13-year-old girl. Next came a 9-year-old, a 4-year-old, and an 11-month-old baby.

①

The children are members of the *indigenous Huitoto tribe. The Huitotos live in the Amazon rainforest, so the children were familiar with some of the plants and fruits that could be found there. At first, the children lived off of flour made from cassava roots. They had found the flour in the airplane *wreckage. When they ran out of flour, the children used their knowledge of the forest's fruits and seeds to survive. (1b), it was a time when many rainforest plants were producing fruit.

②

As soon as the plane went down, people started searching to see if anyone had survived. After two weeks, the plane was found. The people conducting a search found signs that the children might still be alive. Rescue teams flew in helicopters and dropped boxes of food, hoping the children would find them. But they couldn't see the ground because the forest was so (3). The helicopters even played a recorded message from the children's grandmother, encouraging the kids to avoid moving around.

③

Over 150 soldiers were sent out with dogs to search on the ground. These teams left whistles around, hoping the children would find them and use them to make noise. Around 70 indigenous volunteers also helped search. At different points in time, the search teams found (4) of the children — a bottle, a partly-eaten piece of fruit, and even a rough shelter made by the children.

④

Everyone was extremely happy and relieved that the children were safe. Narcizo Mucutuy, the grandfather of the three girls and one boy, told reporters he was delighted at the news of their rescue. Colombian President Gustavo Petro said they were an "example of total survival that will go down in history."

The children were sent to a hospital in Colombia's capital, Bogota, (5) they were expected to stay for about two weeks. The children got healthier and soon were able to eat solid food again.

⑤

The story of the children's survival inspired many people. The children had some knowledge of where to look for food and shelter from their indigenous backgrounds. It also showed how the knowledge and skills of indigenous people can (6) help in difficult times.

(注) *indigenous (その土地・国に) 固有の, 現地の *wreckage 残骸
